

Lindsay Rowe

Lindsay was diagnosed with Meniere's disease when he was 27 and has lived with the disease for 12 years now. His experience with Meniere's has included several severe vertigo attacks which resulted in presentations to hospital emergency departments together with progressive tinnitus and hearing loss. He is very supportive of Meniere's research in Australia and keen to provide insights from his lived experience to researchers. Lindsay is also very keen to support raising research funding for Meniere's research in Australia and communicate the latest research findings to the Meniere's community. He has a career background in health innovation and is keen to see research and innovation accelerate for the benefit of the Meniere's community.
